

November 27, 2007

The challenges of integrating the North American economies

(Photo by Jeff Watts)

Can there be greater economic integration between the United States, Canada, and Mexico? What are the potential costs and benefits? The issue was addressed in a two-day conference, “Building a North American Community: Economic Integration and Regulatory Cooperation,” sponsored by the Center for North American Studies. The two-day conference looked at a host of issues, from regulation to agricultural trade.

Some of the panelists, from left above, were David DeCarme, U.S. Department of Transportation; Raul Rodriguez, former president, North American Development Bank; Isaac Cohen, United Nations Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC); Juan Carlos Villa, Texas A&M University; Ines Bustillo, ECLAC; and AU's Robert Pastor, director of the Center for North American Studies. —SA