

SIMON NICHOLSON is an assistant professor of International Relations in the School of International Service at American University. Nicholson is a member of the Global Environmental Politics faculty. He also serves as Assistant Director of the Global Scholars program, an accelerated undergraduate degree program that allows a carefully selected cohort of students to complete their BA degrees in three years.

Dr. Nicholson received his PhD in International Relations from American University. Prior to joining the American University faculty he served as a lecturer and Director of Clinical Legal Education at the University of Waikato in New Zealand, and as a visiting lecturer on the University of Virginia's Semester at Sea program. He is also a non-resident senior fellow with the Centro de Estudios Estratégicos Latinoamericanos (CEELAT) in Bogotá, Colombia, where he focuses on energy and natural resource concerns.

Nicholson's research and teaching look primarily at the global politics of food and agriculture, and at the opportunities and challenges associated with emerging technologies. His academic and policy-oriented writing has appeared in such journals as Global Environmental Politics, Foreign Policy, and Sustainable Development Law and Policy, as well as in a number of edited books. Dr. Nicholson also speaks regularly in the United States and abroad about environmental action and the global food system.

Dr. Nicholson completed his undergraduate work and a Master of Laws degree in his home country of New Zealand.