New Unit at Washington
To Try Innovations

They will see the manner in which committees deal with bills; they will follow proposed legislation from its initiation, through the various committees, conference and debates, until it is finally defeated or enacted into law. To studying the process, they will observe not only the formal steps, but the informal, including the work of lobbyists, and see the effects they have on the ultimate legislation.

The organization and personnel of the School of Public Affairs, moreover, safeguard it from what might be a fragmented education. Its vis-ing dean and professors, with terms of service not exceeding a year, will make the school secure from the unprofitable acceptance of contemporary policies, programs and organization. Each year, not only new instructors but instructors from different parts of the nation, with different points of view, will bring their insights and predications to bear upon public afsairs as contained in the national capital. Industrial, labor leaders, politicians and a constant stream of political and public officials will offer the students opportunities for instruction in the customary lecture method, but in addition there will be public officials, industrial and labor leaders and qualified representatives of the professional groups, who will conduct roundtable discussions in which, without embarrassment, the most searching inquiries into complex problems of comcost, industry and social processes will be pursued.

Official Aid Pledged.
At the national capital, that is to say, there is to be a laboratory in the field of administration where the minds versed with the doctrines of what government and the social order ought to be, and how their weight should be directed in our society, can have an opportunity of observing at close range the actual operation of the Federal Government. They will study whatever work is closest to their special interests. Those, for instance, who are preparing for a legislative career, may have a special interest in legislation. Those who wish to become important Congressional committee hearings.
